“Parenting Gifted Children”

“Parents are my favorite audience,” said Dr. James Webb as he noted that he found parent audiences to be very receptive and that they are their children’s “most important teachers.” They “teach” their children over a much greater time span than any educator in a school system; they are most familiar with their children’s needs and have a huge vested interest in their success.

While the articles in this issue are nominally directed toward parents, the information within them needs to be owned by educators as well so that together we can better support gifted learners in school and at home.
